PUBLISHERS WEEKLY

In Brief: March 17, 2016

This week, an author takes a break from the “wild” life; a writer hits the road for an important anniversary; an author considers giving up writing for baton-twirling; fans dress the part at a debut author’s book release party; kids flock to a bilingual book event; and readers line up for the latest in a nonfiction adventure series.

Surviving (and Thriving)

With the publication of I Survived: the Hindenburg Disaster, 1937 this month, author Lauren Tarshis kicked off her first national tour for the I Survived series (Scholastic). On the first leg of the trip, she made stops in the New York tri-state area and Milwaukee, Wis. Next month, she continues her tour to California, St. Louis, and Cincinnati. Here, she signs books for students at Munsey Park Elementary School’s Reading Night. Her visit was arranged by Dolphin Bookstore in Port Washington, N.Y.
